Questions 17–20

Read the passage carefully.

For many years, technological progress was often measured by how efficiently machines could perform tasks previously carried out by humans. Today, however, the relationship between humans and technology is becoming more complex. Artificial intelligence can analyse enormous quantities of information within seconds, yet speed alone does not guarantee good judgement. A system may identify patterns accurately while failing to understand why those patterns matter in a particular social or cultural context.

This limitation does not necessarily mean that technology is ineffective. Instead, it suggests that human judgement and technological capability may be most valuable when they complement each other. Technology can process information rapidly, while humans can consider ethical questions, interpret context, and decide which goals are worth pursuing. The challenge, therefore, is not simply to build increasingly powerful machines but to learn how to use them responsibly.

17. What is the main purpose of the passage?

1. To argue that technology will eventually replace human judgement.
2. To explain why technological speed is more important than human understanding.
3. To discuss the complementary roles of human judgement and technology.
4. To prove that artificial intelligence cannot analyse information accurately.

18. According to the passage, why might a technological system fail to make good judgements?

1. It cannot process large amounts of information.
2. It may recognise patterns without understanding their context.
3. It always makes decisions more slowly than humans.
4. It refuses to consider ethical questions.

19. The word “complement” in the second paragraph is closest in meaning to:

1. replace
2. compete with
3. complete or strengthen
4. control

20. Which statement can reasonably be inferred from the passage?

1. More powerful technology automatically leads to more responsible decisions.
2. Ethical judgement is unnecessary when information is accurate.
3. Humans and technology have identical strengths.
4. Responsible use of technology requires more than simply improving its technical power.
